IPSEC Protection against attacks

IPSec protects data so that an attacker finds it extremely difficult or impossible to interpret it. The level of protection provided is determined by the strength of the security levels specified in your IPSec policy structure. IPSec has a number of features that significantly reduce or prevent the following attacks:

* Sniffers (lack of confidentiality)

The Encapsulating Security Payload (ESP) protocol in IPSec provides data confidentiality by encrypting the payload of IP packets.

* Data modification

IPSec uses cryptography-based keys, shared only by the sending and receiving computers, to create a cryptographic checksum for each IP packet. Any modification to the packet data alters the checksum, which indicates to the receiving computer that the packet was modified in transit.

* Identity spoofing, password-based, and application-layer attacks

IPSec allows the exchange and verification of identities without exposing that information to interpretation by an attacker. Mutual verification (authentication) is used to establish trust between the communicating systems and only trusted systems can communicate with each other.
