NEW QUESTION: 3

Which statement below is the BEST example of separation of duties?

- A. One person initiates a request for a payment and another authorizes that same payment.
- B. An activity that checks on the system, its users, or the environment.
- C. A data entry clerk may not have access to run database analysis reports.
- D. Getting users to divulge their passwords.

Answer: A

Explanation:

Separation of duties refers to dividing roles and responsibilities so that a single individual cannot subvert a critical process. In financial systems, no single individual should normally be given the authority to issue checks. Checks and balances need to be designed into both the process as well as the specific, individual positions of personnel who will implement the process. *Answer "An activity that checks on the system, its users, or the environment" describes system monitoring. *Answer "Getting users to divulge their passwords" is social engineering, a method of subverting system controls by getting users or administrators to divulge information about systems, including their passwords. *Answer "A data entry clerk may not have access to run database analysis reports" describes least privilege. Least privilege refers to the security objective of granting users only those accesses they need to perform their official duties. Least privilege does not mean that all users will have extremely little functional access; some employees will have significant access if it is required for their position. It is important to make certain that the implementation of least privilege does not interfere with the ability to have personnel substitute for each other without undue delay. Without careful planning, access control can interfere with contingency plans. Source: National Institute of
